ABSTRACT

This research was carried out to investigate the causes of internal conflicts in Kenya, Rift Valley Province, Molo District and its limitations on the fundamental rights and freedom of people. It is organized in five chapters, Chapter one highlights the problem statement, objectives and purpose of the study, its significance, research questions and assumptions of the study. The second chapter outlines the literature available related to the research project. This chapter examines the occurrences and impacts of internal conflicts in Kenya, Rift Valley Province and on Molo residents. The researcher critically analyzed available secondary literature to establish academic gaps on ethnic conflicts in Kenya in general and Molo. Chapter three presents the design of the study. It deals with the description of the population, data collection procedure, method used in the identification of the sample, description of the research instrument, validity of the instrument and reliability of the instruments. In chapter four the researcher looks at the research findings after collection of data from the field. The outcome of the research are based on the objectives of the study in chapter one. Chapter five contains the recommendations that relate to the Government of Kenya, the Church and the community in general. The discussion, findings and conclusions that the recommendations are based upon are fully laid out in the preceding chapters
